Federal judge temporarily blocks Tennessee's 'abortion trafficking' law

Kimberlee Kruesi
Associated Press

A federal judge has temporarily blocked Tennessee from enforcing a law banning adults from helping minors get an abortion without parental permission.

In a 49-page ruling, U.S. District Judge Aleta Trauger argued that the Republican-controlled state cannot "make it a crime to communicate freely" about legal abortion options even in a state where abortion is banned at all stages of pregnancy except for a handful of situations. Trauger's decision means that the law will be placed on hold as the case make its way through court.

"The Tennessee General Assembly apparently determined that, when the topic at hand is 'abortion trafficking,' the best interests of the pregnant child are not merely a secondary consideration, but unworthy of particularized consideration at all,"

Trauger wrote.

Earlier this year, Tennessee's Republican lawmakers and GOP Gov. Bill Lee signed off on a proposal making it illegal for an adult who "intentionally recruits, harbors, or transports" a pregnant child or teen within the state to get an abortion without consent from the minor's parents or guardians. Those convicted of breaking the law risked being charged with a Class A misdemeanor, which requires a nearly one-year jail sentence.

The law, which went into effect July 1, did not contain exemptions for minors who may have been raped by their parents or guardians.

Instead, the statute dictated that biological fathers who cause the pregnancy of their daughters, if minors, couldn't pursue legal actions.

The Tennessee law mimicked the so-called "abortion trafficking" law enacted in Idaho last year, the first state to ever enact such a statute. However, a federal judge has since temporarily blocked Idaho's version as the case moves through court.

Just before the law was poised to go into effect, Democratic Rep. Aftyn Behn and Nashville attorney Rachel Welty filed a lawsuit on the second anniversary of the Supreme Court's decision overturning Roe v. Wade, the 1973 decision that had guaranteed a constitutional right to abortion.

Behn called the Tennessee ruling a "monumental victory for free speech and the fight for abortion rights."

"This ruling doesn't just protect Tennesseans - it safeguards the freedom to discuss abortion care across state lines, ensuring that we can continue to offer support, share accurate information, and stand up for the rights of those seeking essential health care everywhere," she said.

A spokesperson for Attorney General's office, who was fighting to get the case dismissed, did not immediately respond to an emailed request for comment on Friday's ruling.

Trauger's decision sided with Welty and Behn's argument that the Tennessee law was "unconstitutionally vague," specifically stressing that the word "recruits" is undefined in the statute.

Trauger also raised several First Amendment concerns in her explanation that her ruling would apply across the state, not just to Welty and Behn.

"The freedom of speech guaranteed by the First Amendment is not simply a special protection that the Constitution grants to a few, high-profile speakers so that those speakers can hear themselves talk; it is a protection available to everyone, for the interconnected benefit of everyone, because messages do not gain their fullest power by being uttered, but by being spread," Trauger wrote.

Tennessee bans abortions at all stages of pregnancy, but there are exemptions in cases of molar pregnancies, ectopic pregnancies, and to remove a miscarriage or to save the life of the mother. Notably, doctors must use their "reasonable medical" judgment - a term that some say is too vague and can be challenged by fellow medical officials - in deciding whether providing the procedure can save the life of the pregnant patient or prevent major injury.

A group of women is currently suing in a separate case to clarify the state's abortion ban. A court decision is expected soon on whether the lawsuit can continue or if Tennessee's abortion ban can be placed on hold as the legal battle continues.

Hey everybody, who has their Christmas tree up already?

It seems like this year with Thanksgiving being a little later that more people are decorating earlier. We started decorating the shop in mid-October, but I normally don't put my own tree up at home until after Thanksgiving.

I think it's because fall is my favorite season and I like to keep my pumpkins out for as long as possible. But in saying that, most people I know already have their trees up.

Mom and I went to the Pickwick Southside School harvest festival and had a great time. We played bingo, got some baked goods and treats, and went to the holiday mart in the gym.

Last year I set up at the holiday mart, but this year the shop was too busy to commit to it. I would love to do it next year though. Mom loved seeing everyone and catching up and all the hugs.

District 3 Community Center is selling beautiful hand-painted Pickwick Lake ornaments as a fundraiser. We have them at the flower shop and you will see them at various businesses around town as well.

Organizers say that every cent goes to the community center as they were unable to do some of the fundraisers they normally do through the year. Quantities are limited.
